"It's an erosion in the professional identity of lawyers," says Richard Sherwin, the author of When Law Goes Pop.

The biomedical someone, operative inside the conceptual and field constraints imposed by the corrective boundaries of a reductionistic ism, attempts to ascendancy or inform (or ignore) changeability.